

Essay 7: Young

Abhi Agarwal

Firstly, just looking at the structure of the first couple chapters I found some of the ideas to be scattered at different places and I found it hard to relate some of the things together. However, I also note that we've only read the first couple chapters of the book - so I don't think she manages to form her central thesis yet.

One of my favorite quotation in this reading was on page 32. Young writes "Self-determination, the second aspect of justice as I understand it, consists in being able to participate in determining one's action and the condition of one's action; its contrary is domination" (32).

I didn't quite understand her feelings towards communities within democracies though. Her inclusion principle was intriguing, but what would she feel about people being excluded from communities within? I think the central questions she tries to answer and ask questions on revolve around this issue. I just didn't think we read enough chapters for me to get a gist of what her consensus was on this issue.
